He takes a thorough and critical look at a crime scene, investigates an entire case and reports his conclusions to the examining magistrate. This is the second episode. This was the only series Maigret appeared in that was not created by Maigret himself, as he never actually appeared in it. All episodes were directed by Jacques Becker. Plot Murdered women of all ages are collected by Monsieur Maigret in the morgue, and he sees that they are no longer alive: they have been strangled. He then traces the victims back to their earlier lives and tries to establish the motives for the killing. He believes that each murder relates to a long-standing grudge, which he tries to establish. Main characters Charles Maigret (1958-1959) Other characters Tensions between Maigret and the examining magistrate are often the subject of the series. The examining magistrate Claude Lebel has a background in police work, but often acts as an impediment to Maigret's investigations, for example, refusing Maigret's request to act as a witness at an important court case. The investigating magistrate and his police officers were originally played by William Aguet and Jean-Claude Dreyfus respectively. By 1959, when the series began, they were played by Pierre Diot and Charles Lemoine, respectively. The document, leaked to the Telegraph, states that a "hard Brexit" is "probably" the best option for leaving the EU. Labour MP Chris Leslie, who was one of only two Tory MPs to vote against leaving the EU, condemned the document. "This Government is committed to damaging Britain's economy and jobs through a damaging Brexit," said Mr Leslie, adding that "now the Government is finally admitting it". The 82157476af
